ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Certainly in mining this piece of history, which is little known if compared with the story of western democracy, I owe a great many intellectual debts to those who have helped me.

First of all, I am indebted to Professor Wang Gungwu, not only for his useful advice in the field of Chinese and overseas Chinese history, but much more for his almost intuitive sense of terminology and the theoretical framework, which helped me to lay the foundation of this work. Equipped with an overall view, I was able to go deeper and deeper into the origins of Chinese kongsi which even now still lie off the beaten track of most of the historians.

Secondly, I am equally grateful to Dr Anthony Reid who paid special attention to the structure and detail of this book. The attention brought me to almost every single aspect of the life of the men of kongsis, not just their government in evolution, but also their desires of earthly bliss, as towkays as well as coolies. If history is a conversation with the past, the voice from her is life.

Apart from the supervision, the help that friends generously provided me the guiding light has have been no less a contributing factor to the birth of this book. Among them: Dr Jennifer Cushman not only kindly lent me her unpublished thesis, but also painstakingly read through and commented on the first two chapters; and Dr Campbell Macknight carefully read and checked through the introduction and the last three chapters. And I am still moved by the voluntary translation of Temmink from French by Antonia Finnane, and Ian, a resident of Burton Hall, and Wendy Stoke, my Dutch tutor, and Shun Ikada for helping me with Dutch and Japanese sources.
