

The Rise of Early Modern Science

Islam, China, and the West

Toby E. Huff

Contents

List of illustrations	page x
Preface	xi
Acknowledgments	xiii
Introduction	1
1 The comparative study of science	8
The modernity of science	8
Science as a civilizational institution	11
Elements of the sociological perspective	14
The role of the scientist	16
The ethos of science	22
Paradigms and scientific communities	25
Comparative civilizational sociology of science:
Joseph Needham	32
Benjamin Nelson: universalization and wider spheres of discourse	40
Conclusion: the issues at hand	45
2 Arabic science and the Islamic world	47
The problem of Arabic science	47
The achievements of Arabic astronomy	54
Role-sets, institutions, and science	62
Social roles and cultural elites	66
Institutions of higher learning and research	71
Institution building and the marginality problem	84
Summary	87

3 Reason and rationality in Islam and the West	91
The Islamic legal background	93
Reason, man, and nature in Europe	99
Reason and conscience	107
Conclusion	116
4 The European legal revolution	119
The development of modern Western law	121
The papal revolution	125
The breakthrough in inherited logics	128
Corporations and jurisdiction	134
Revolution and the parting of the ways	141
5 Colleges, universities, and sciences	149
Madrasas: Islamic colleges	151
Universities and the West	160
Islamic protoscientific institutions	169
Western universities and the place of science	186
Medicine and the universities: the quest for universalistic norms	197
6 Cultural climates and the ethos of science	202
The arresting of Arabic science	204
Internal factors	208
External factors: cultural and institutional impediments	213
Conclusion	235
7 Science and civilization in China	237
The problem of Chinese science	237
China and the comparative context	248
The emergence of imperial China	252
Chinese law	262
Education and the examination system	275
Reprise	285
8 Science and social organization in China	287
Some problems of written Chinese	290
Chinese modes of thought	296
Institutional impediments and patterns of opportunity	304
Conclusion	314
9 The rise of early modern science	321
The Copernican revolution	322
The institutionalization problem	328

Contents

ix

Science, learning, and the medieval revolution	335
The revolution in authority and astronomy	341
Epilogue: science and civilizations East and West	360
Selected bibliography	365
Index	387