

OXFORD IN ASIA COLLEGE TEXTS

THE MAKING OF MODERN MALAYSIA AND SINGAPORE

N. J. Ryan

OXFORD IN ASIA COLLEGE TEXTS

The formation of Malaysia in 1963 and the independence of Singapore in 1965 have meant the reshaping of the existing histories of Malaya. Malaysia includes the territories of Sabah and Sarawak, which means that the new histories must be presented with a much wider coverage. They must include not only the events leading up to the formation of Malaysia and the independence of Singapore, but also the earlier history of the component states.

A large portion of this book consists of material relating to the history of Sabah and Sarawak in the nineteenth century and also to recent events in South-East Asia.

The book is based upon the author's experience in teaching in the upper forms of Malaysian secondary schools. Though primarily intended for students preparing for the School Certificate Examination, it should also be of use to the general reader who requires a short and up-to-date history of Malaysia and Singapore presented in a South-East Asian context rather than as an adjunct to European politics.

Oxford in Asia College Texts is a series of reprints and new books published as paperbacks designed to help university and College students (in the developing countries of the Commonwealth and in other similar areas) to overcome the problem of the high price of imported books.

A wide range of subjects is covered and the titles selected for reprinting and inclusion in the series are all standard textbooks or works of reference with an established international reputation. Their appeal is sufficiently wide for them to be of equal value in no matter which country they are being used, and they are selected with particular attention to the needs of advanced students.

From time to time new books which possess the same qualities as these established titles will be chosen for inclusion in the series. As the series grows it will lay the foundation of a valuable and comprehensive 'university' library.

ISBN 0 19 638120 7

