Genting Highlands has sense of social commitment

Elizabeth Moreira

DURING the recent school holidays, I look my family up to Genting Highlands for the weekend and was pleasantly surprised to note the many activities initiated for the children during this period.

I also had the rare opportunity to witness the Highlanders Kids Club's anniversary launching graced by the Deputy Education Minister, Datuk Dr Fong Chan Onn, which was in conjunction with the launch of the Highlanders Tales storybook.

I was even more surprised to learn that the weekly Highlander Kids television programme is produced by Genting Highlands specially for children, which means Genting Highlands does indeed make an effort by producing not only a special storybook but also a television show and other children's activities which were held during my visit.

As for the television programme itself, not only is it very educational, it is informative and also promotes a healthy and fun concept with the inclusion of fun-games which usually keeps my kids glued to the television each week.

It is a credit to Genting Highlands for conceiving such programmes for the children. They have displayed a great sense of social commitment catering for our future generation by equipping them both mentally and physically for Vision 2020 as envisioned by Prime Minister Datuk Seri Dr Mahathir Mohamad.

Genting Highlands has certainly taken great pains during the school holidays as was evident from the variety of fun and exciting programmes they tailored for the children at both the indoor and outdoor theme parks. These consisted of birthday parties with the Genting mascots, roller-blade demonstrations, marching bands.
