

Malaysians must treat knowledge with respect

Forty years on, despite a partial national education implementation, the situation still leaves much to be desired

On Politics

By ABDULLAH AHMAD

INEQUALITY, actual or perceived, is the greatest motivating force in Malaysian politics. I must emphasise that I am talking about inequality rather than equality, precisely because equality is not found outside the world of mathematics.

When some Malaysians cry for equality, they are actually demanding equality with respect to a particular thing or other. Indeed, they simply want more. In short, it is superiority, rather than equality, that they are striving for.

Inequality was, and is, a basis for conflict in nations as diverse as Zimbabwe, the US, India and even us. Unequal education, like income, is a growing source of discontent among the Bumiputeras. This inequality, besides political Islam, is especially important for understanding the existence of militants among many of them.

One of the best ways to bring about national integration is via education but it has always been a contentious issue. Before Merdeka, education was, and even now is, to a large degree organised and recognised as a system which only fosters a centrifugal tendency.

When I was in school in the Fifties, I believe less than 20 per cent of Malaysians (Malays forming the smallest number) attended English-medium schools which fostered some racial contact and a kind of Malayanness.

Forty years on, despite a partial national education implementation, the situation has changed a little but leaves much to be desired. Many schools, though following the national curriculum, remain outside the national system in reality.

Three of the four prime ministers held the Education portfolio - Tun Razak, Datuk Hussein Onn and Datuk Seri Dr Mahathir Mohamnd. All were charged with bridging foundation in the basic courses in their early years and their success later as undergraduates and graduate students at the university level.

In addition, American educators and administrators in higher education have been relating for many years that a significant portion of their financial resources in the form of facilities and teaching staff have been needed for remedial coursework for students at entry level, at the expense of higher quality university course offerings.

In the state of Oklahoma, for example, the Governor and state legislature have mandated higher minimum requirements in the fundamentals of maths, science, English and history in the curriculum of state-funded lack of commitment and rigour in acquiring knowledge?

The vitality of the other Malaysians, the Chinese and Indians in particular, always amazes me and has my admiration. I am happy for them.

They are despite, or perhaps because of, everything, blessed with tireless zeal and stamina and dedication. As if their motto is: "Be not afraid of greatness" Shakespeare, Twelfth Night.

Whatever one may say about British colonialism in Malaysia, it left behind one enduring influence a good basis for education especially to train Malaysians (and Sarawakians and North Borneans before 1963) to achieve the goals of Whitehall in Malaya. It made many old generations of Malaysians empire was the splendour and the ceremony, the Malay royalty, the aristocracy, the Chinese and Indian merchants who yearned for imperial honours and savoured imperial ritual. Their world was antiquity and anachronism, tradition and honour, order and subordination, about glory and chivalry, processions and ceremony, plumed hats and parties. In short, about hierarchy, ostentation and ornamentation.

The British governors and pro-Consuls made the local leaders and lesser Malaysians, through all this and the English language and loyalty training, the pillars that propped up the British Raj for a hundred years until our independence 44 years ago. We, more or less, sustain this anachronistic system but the result is less satisfactory.

Columnist Yunus Raiss asked what were the overriding educational aims of Malaya at independence? And if I may add, now?

For the first 10 years of Merdeka, everything looked well educationally. Then a vengeance. We saw it in the last general election, in the civil service and even to some extent in the professional and corporate sectors. The worst is yet to come unless there is some drastic reform, and that quickly.

We should reconsider introducing a new education policy, a review of the present one, to produce and inculcate an ideal image of Malaysians to keep at bay the forces against modernity, nationalism and anything that smacks of a unified Malaysian nation that the highways and mass education (albeit being less and less marketable) have made possible.

Life has changed and is changing. Europeans, Japanese, Americans and Africans have introduced a more cosmopolitan note into the life of new Malaysia. We have become a part of the global village. We are coping and shall have to withstand the Western cultural assault, or is it the mul-lahs'?

The Mahathir government must decide

---

We should reconsider introducing a new education policy, a review of the present one, to produce and inculcate an ideal image of Malaysians to keep at bay the forces against modernity, nationalism and anything that smacks of a unified Malaysian nation...

---

succession of ultra-nationalist Education Ministers, who sent their children overseas, decided to ditch English and promote Malay, the national language.

No one quarrelled then, or now, with Malay as the national and official language. Why did we exchange English as the medium of instruction for Malay? Why didn't we wait until we had enough books in English translated into Malay by learned people rather than, as Yunus said, by those who had good command of Malay and only a passable knowledge of English?

This is perhaps the primary cause of decline in the standard of education in the country. The other reason was and is the fact that education has been politicised, to our national detriment. Dr Mahathir had lambasted his over-zealous and super-nationalist predecessors and the ultra-nationalist educationists.

Of course, the education system, despite that has, in a way, delivered. But what types of Malaysians have we created? The chickens have come home to roost with a before it is too late: his natural kindness should not temper his sense of duty. Education must provide Malaysians an understanding of the world and their place in it. Meritocracy is absolutely necessary to prepare Bumiputeras to face new challenges.

Great teachers a great nation make. Do we have good teachers, let alone remarkably superior ones? A great nation needs great thinkers and they need great teachers. Bad teaching wastes a great deal of effort and spoils many lives which might have been full of energy to make our nation an even better place.

Samuel Johnson says, "He that teaches us anything which we knew not before is undoubtedly to be revered as a Master."

It is not too late, I suppose, to propagate that English is a peerless language, and helped in the training of our people to be loyal to the government and party which hauled down the Union Jack, and made us what we are today and what we shall be tomorrow.