nation or serving its own interest?" he asked.

Praba said new parties, including those by ex-prime ministers, cannot be just about toppling the existing regime.

"New players have to present their ideology, policy positions, strategic thinking and vision for the nation.

"Not completely, since they are finding their footing, but enough to tell the rakyat what they are and what they are not.

"It is horrible to be referred to as the party of people who have been either sacked by Umno or displaced by national leaders and cannot join opposition parties due to historical acrimony," he added.

Praba said the new party should not become like the Malaysia Civil Liberties Movement, Parti Cinta Malaysia and State Reform Party, filled with good intentions but no substance, and only used as a platform to contest in elections.

He argued that new parties must be able to build through their members, and not just constantly line up veteran politicians on stages and on banners.

Specifically, he opined that at a practical level, if there is no ideological glue binding them, would the new party wilt if its leaders departed?
