Malaysia's transformation from an agricultural hollow into a vibrant economy has been the result of concerted efforts by the government, with invaluable support from the private sector and especially financial institutions, such as AmBank, that have stood the test of time.

Along with increasing urgency to manage climate change, AmBank has made green financing a key priority and has even been appointed by Bank Negara as its exclusive banking partner in the Greening Value Chain which aims to support SMEs in their energy transition.

As the investment bank that supported Telekom Malaysia throughout its privatisation exercise and subsequent listing, AmBank has played an integral role in the development of telecommunications and digital technologies in the country.
